In a world where plastic pollution is becoming an increasingly pressing issue, artist Jessica Maison is using her art to raise awareness and inspire change.

Maison's work, known as the "Plastic Girl Extinction" series, features haunting and evocative sculptures made entirely from discarded plastic.

Through her art, she seeks to expose the devastating effects of plastic pollution on both wildlife and the environment.

Jessica Maison's Life and Work

Maison was born in 1985 in the United States. She has always been fascinated by nature, and she began working with recycled materials in her early twenties. In 2016, she launched the "Plastic Girl Extinction" series, which has since gained international recognition.

Maison's sculptures are made from a variety of plastic materials, including bottles, bags, straws, and toys. She painstakingly collects these materials from beaches, landfills, and recycling centers. By transforming them into art, she hopes to give them a new purpose and to highlight the problem of plastic pollution.

The Plastic Girl Extinction Series

The "Plastic Girl Extinction" series depicts female figures in various states of decay. Some sculptures are frozen in time, their expressions filled with pain and despair. Others are more abstract, their bodies melting away into nothingness. Through her art, Maison aims to represent the suffering and extinction that plastic pollution is causing to wildlife and the environment.

One of the most striking sculptures in the series is "Plastic Girl 1.0." The sculpture depicts a young girl with a plastic bottle for a head. The bottle is filled with water, and it is slowly dripping out of the girl's mouth. The sculpture is a powerful reminder of the dangers of plastic pollution to human health and well-being.

Maison's Mission and Impact

Maison's mission is to inspire change and to raise awareness about plastic pollution. Through her art, she hopes to educate people about the importance of reducing their plastic consumption and to encourage them to take action to protect the planet.

Maison's work has been exhibited in galleries and museums around the world. It has also been featured in numerous publications, including The New York Times, The Guardian, and National Geographic. Her work has helped to raise awareness about plastic pollution and has inspired people to take action to reduce their plastic consumption.

Jessica Maison is a passionate and dedicated artist who is using her art to make a difference in the world. Through her "Plastic Girl Extinction" series, she is raising awareness about the devastating effects of plastic pollution and inspiring people to take action to protect the planet.

Maison's work is a powerful reminder that we all have a responsibility to reduce our plastic consumption and to protect the environment. By taking action, we can help to create a more sustainable future for both ourselves and for generations to come.
