NIIHI was established in 2006 with the mission of "improving health and wellbeing through innovation, research, and education." Since its inception, NIIHI has supported a wide range of projects, including:

- The development of new medical technologies
- The conduct of clinical trials
- The training of healthcare professionals
- The provision of healthcare services to underserved populations
- The promotion of global health

NIIHI has made a significant impact on the health and wellbeing of people in Northern Ireland and around the world. For example, NIIHI-supported research has led to the development of new treatments for cancer, heart disease, and other chronic diseases.

NIIHI has also helped to train a new generation of healthcare professionals who are committed to improving the health and wellbeing of their communities.

In 2020, NIIHI was revised and reinvigorated to meet the challenges of the 21st century. The revised NIIHI has a new mission of "accelerating innovation in healthcare to improve the health and wellbeing of people in Northern Ireland and around the world." The revised NIIHI also has a new set of strategic priorities, including:

- Precision medicine: Developing new ways to prevent, diagnose, and treat diseases based on an individual's genetic makeup and other factors.
- Digital health: Using technology to improve the delivery of healthcare services and to empower patients to manage their own health.

- Global health: Addressing the health challenges facing developing countries and promoting global health equity.
- Health workforce: Developing and supporting a highly skilled and compassionate health workforce.
- Patient and public involvement: Ensuring that patients and the public have a voice in the design and delivery of healthcare services.

The revised NIIHI is a bold and ambitious plan to improve the health and wellbeing of people in Northern Ireland and around the world. NIIHI is well-positioned to meet the challenges of the 21st century and to make a significant impact on the health and wellbeing of future generations.
